

Repairing the heart without using stem cells

When a person suffers a heart attack, scar tissue forms over the damaged areas of the heart, reducing the organ's function. However, in a recent study, scientists successfully turned this scar tissue into working heart muscle without the use of stem cells.

View the original article here: Repairing the heart without using stem cells – Fox News