

A costly California food labeling proposal

The state of California is all but bankrupt—yet professional activists have figured out a way to send us even further into hock, with a costly food-labeling proposition that will appear on the ballot this November. They want tens of thousands of common grocery-store items to carry special labels that indicate biotech ingredients.

View the original article here: A costly California food labeling proposal