

UK should ban, or at least label, GMOs

There is no doubt that it was a declaration of the Government's colours on genetically modified farming when Environment Secretary Owen Paterson rounded on critics of GM technology as 'humbugs' last week, and insisted GM food should be grown and sold widely in Britain.

During the course of his ringing endorsement, he managed to spark outrage and alarm by claiming 'there isn't a single piece of meat being served [in a typical London restaurant] where a bullock hasn't eaten some GM feed'.

His belligerent intent was quite clear. The message he wanted to get across was that GM crops are already here and in the food chain, there's nothing to fear — and nothing we can do about it.

View the original article here: ‘Frankenstein food’ a good thing? It’s all great GM lies