

Should Lance Armstrong be celebrated as a pioneer in human enhancement?

The following is an excerpt.

There's no getting away from the fact that breaking the rules is wrong. Everyone agrees that rules should be kept to preserve the game — unless of course they are bad rules. Everyone agrees that there are good reasons to make dangerous drugs and substances illegal in sports — unless of course they could be made safe. But, what if anti-doping rules can be shown to increase the risks athletes take or the harm they suffer? We'll park that for a moment while we consider how the future may change our perception of doping, people's willingness to do it, and the severity of the consequences.

Read the full article here: Lance Armstrong should be celebrated as a pioneer in human enhancement