

Gene therapy studies show potential for HIV control without drugs

The following is an excerpt.

Gene therapy approaches that involve the genetic modification of human haematopoietic stem cells have the potential to engineer HIV control by introducing cells resistant to HIV infection, the 20th Conference on Retroviruses and Opportunistic Infections (CROI 2013) heard last week.

View the original article here: Gene therapy studies show potential for HIV control without drugs