

GM protesters' newest tactic: "Soup's on!"

The following is an excerpt.

WASHINGTON — When authorities got wind of a demonstration planned for Monday outside the Food and Drug Administration's offices in College Park, Md., they fortified their defenses.

A motorcycle and nine police vans, ominously marked "Homeland Security," parked in front of the FDA building, and uniformed officers fanned out across the entrance, where they waited.

And waited.

And waited.

They needn't have. The demonstrators, demanding that the FDA require the labeling of genetically modified foods, hadn't come with violence in mind, or even civil disobedience. They had come to cook a 50-gallon vat of soup on the sidewalk and then consume the stuff — a first-ever "eat-in" at the FDA, they said.
