

Scaremongers and ignorance might win with “Right to Know Act”

The following is an excerpt.

Unfortunately, as the press release from Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) notes, polls show that most Americans, spooked by anti-technology activist and organic commercial interest scare campaigns, want foods containing ingredients derived from biotech crops (nearly anything containing corn or soy) labeled.

Frankly, ignorance looks like it's going to win, so food companies should just go ahead and slap labels on everything they sell reporting: “This product may contain ingredients derived from safe modern biotechnology.”

View the original article here: Scaremongers Unite!: Genetically Engineered Food Right-to-Know Act Introduced in Congress

Additional Resources:

- “California Initiative Puts Profit Ahead of Science,” Reason.com
- “Genetically Engineered Food Labeling Taken On By Congress In Right-To-Know Act,” Huffington Post
- “Campaign for GM Food Labeling Gets New State Battleground,” Food Safety News