

Could the non-GMO label threaten the organic label?

The following is an edited excerpt.

As the Non-GMO Project logo appears on more and more grocery shelves, some members of the organic food community expressed concerns that non-GMO will hurt sales of organic foods.

“The non-GMO label threatens the USDA Organic label,” says Greg Lickteig, director, The Scoular Company, which sells organic and non-GMO grains. “Given two products on the grocery store shelf, one being non-GMO and the other organic, the non-GMO product will most certainly be less expensive.”
