

Anti-GMO activists have the ‘right to be manipulated’

The list of supermarkets, companies and restaurants hopping aboard the anti-GMO train keeps growing. Last year Whole Foods and Chipotle made headlines for their pledges to go GMO-free. Numerous food companies have already slapped such a label on their products.

Anti-biotechnology activists may have been on the losing end of recent GMO labeling ballot initiatives in Washington and California, but their broader campaign against genetically modified foods appears to be succeeding. Never mind that it's a fundamentally dishonest and disingenuous campaign. It's not about the "right to know," it's about the right to be scared by misinformation and fear-mongering rhetoric. It's about the right to be manipulated by activists and food companies.
