

Organic and anti-GMO movements in perfect anti-technological symbiosis

You can't separate the organic movement from the anti-GMO movement. They are one and the same, existing in perfect anti-technological symbiosis. What's bad for GMOs is good for organics and vice versa.

With GMO labeling initiatives underway in 26 out of 50 states, and a global campaign to stop life-saving GM Golden Rice from being approved, you're supposed to believe the leaders of the multibillion-dollar organic industry are just watching innocently from the sidelines.

Nothing could be further from the truth. Once an activist, always an activist. And when Democratic State Senator Noreen Evans claims her GMO labeling bill – an idea that Californians already defeated once – is “agnostic on whether GMOs are good, or whether they are bad,” she's lying. Since when do politicians label things for no reason?

Read the full, original article: Organic activists need GMOs now more than ever