

Entomologists say urban hobby beekeepers are serious threat to wild bees

There is a downside to the urban beehive boom in Montreal. Entomologists say honey bee hives are a growing threat to native pollinators.

They are squeezing out the native species that were busy pollinating Quebec plants long before European honey bees were imported into the province — and Montreal's official opposition party wants the city to do something about it.

Read full, original article: Supporters of new controls for urban beekeeping say popularity is putting the squeeze on Quebec's wild bees